30 Ethics and etiquette

I'm sitting North, with both sides vulnerable, and my partner opens INT. The auction goes as follows:

The 2♦ bid is alerted as showing spades and another. East's 2♥ is not alerted. Two passes to me and I ask about the 2♥ bid. I'm told it's a six-card heart suit. So I pass and my partner's on lead. At which point East calls the Director.

I figure I'm in trouble because I asked about a bid which had not been alerted. I prepare to apologise and explain that I assumed that it was a conventional response to an Astro enquiry just denying three spades.

• K10753

East explains the bidding sequence and points out that I was, in fact, given wrong information and that he was actually denying three spades, as I suspected.

The ruling took a while to resolve but we eventually played the board, with East managing to scramble five tricks for three off and a top for my partner and me.

A good example of ethics and etiquette by East at the Bridge table. But it gets better

Unfortunately delays with the first board meant that we had insufficient time to start the second board. Being unsure how to record 'no play' on the Bridgemate handset, I asked East what I had to do. He replied that the first thing I should do is call the Director and claim an average plus, as the delay was not my fault, i.e. it was either East's or the Director's!

The Director agreed and awarded 50% to East-West and 60% to my partner and me.

So two examples of ethics and etiquette at the Bridge table.

For the purposes of this Replay, South and West can remain anonymous, but I think that I should not spare East's blushes and Phil Green should get the credit that he deserves.

Note

The situation described above is covered by Law 75B, which states that players are entitled to an accurate description of their opponents' system. But who corrects, and when?

- If West becomes aware of his own error, he must call the Director immediately.
- East must not say anything during the auction. If he becomes declarer or dummy, as in this case, he must call the Director after the final Pass and volunteer a correction of the explanation.
- Had East become a defender, he must say nothing until play ends, to avoid giving his partner unauthorised information. At the end of play, however, the Director must be called.

Oh yes - and if you have no time to play a hand, you enter the contract as 0 on the BM handset! cj
